

Millennials are focused on a career for me, paving their own path and developing the skills to ensure employment security. Managing others is low on their list; money and purpose matter much more. It is time to rethink people practices to attract, retain and develop the next generation of leaders.

BEING THE BOSS IS A LOW PRIORITY

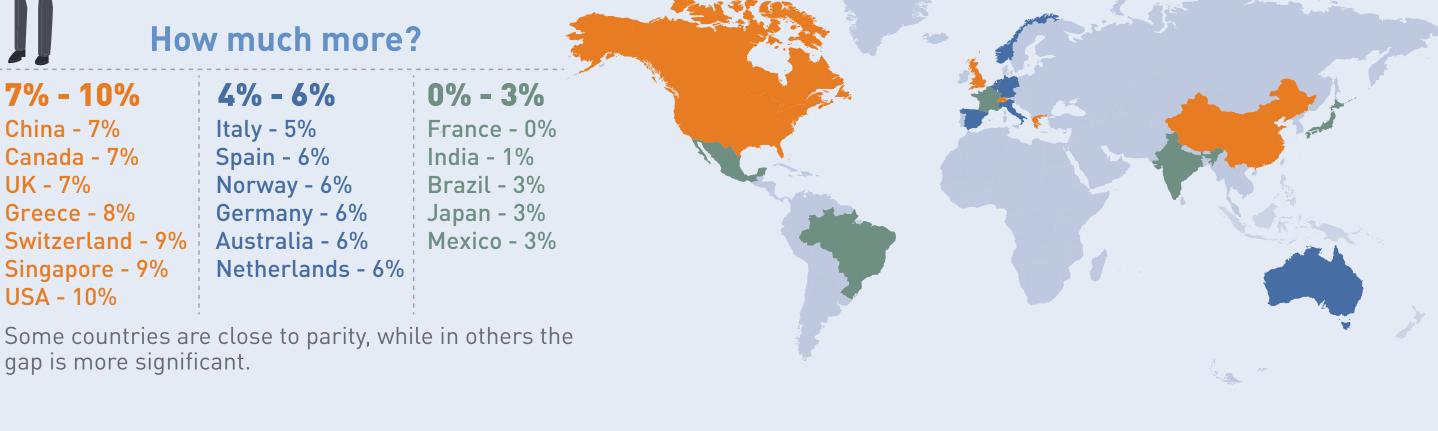

Just 8% of Millennials rank aspiring to leadership roles as a top career priority.

MEN ASPIRE TO LEAD MORE THAN WOMEN

China - 7% Canada - 7% UK - 7% Greece - 8% Switzerland - 9% Singapore - 9% USA - 10%

gap is more significant.

MY SKILLS, MY CAREER

Individual Skills 67%

Managerial Skills 33%

Managerial Skills

• Leadership: 24% • People management: 9%

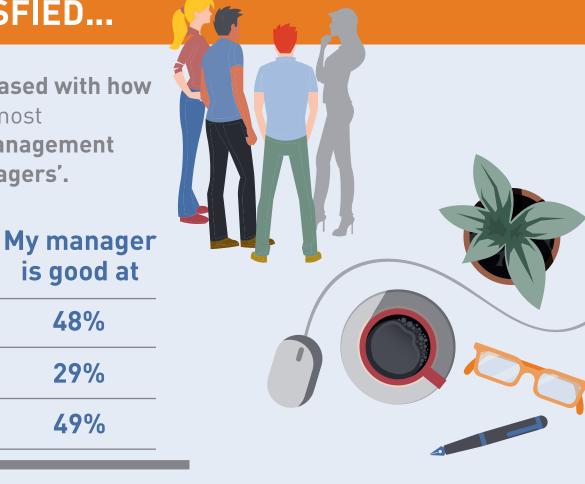

Work with great people

- Individual Skills
- Technical job skills: 28% Personal skills / Teamwork /
- Communication: 24% • IT/Technology: 15%

PLEASED, BUT NOT SATISFIED...

Three-quarters of Millennials are pleased with how they are being managed... however, most Millennials rank their own people management style more positively than their managers'.

I'm good at		is good at
76%	Listening	48%
67%	Offering feedback	29%
65%	Giving encouragement	49%

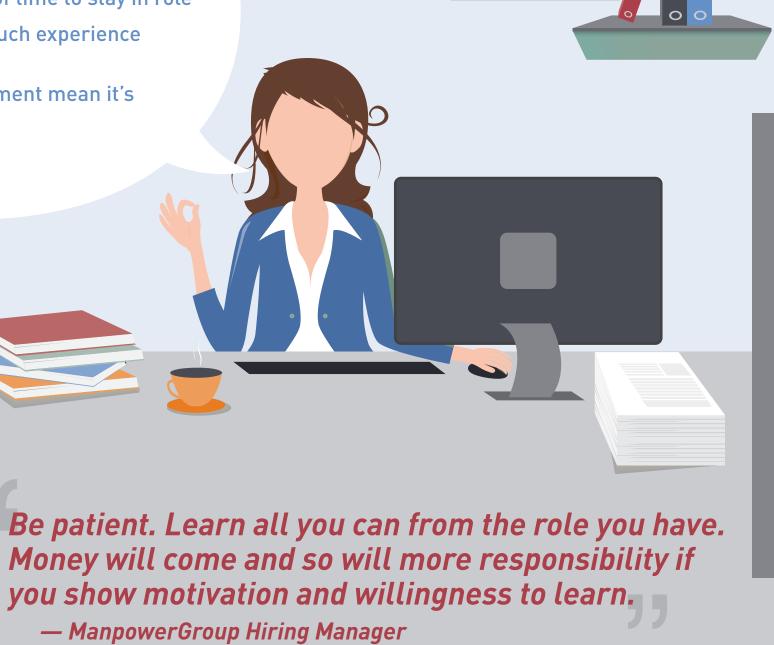

WHAT HIRING MANAGERS SAY...

Get it RIGHT • Learning new skills is key to advancement

Where Millennials

- 2 years is right amount of time to stay in role • Employers expect too much experience
- from job seekers • Low pay and no development mean it's
- time to go

you show motivation and willingness to learn. — ManpowerGroup Hiring Manager

Attracting, Retaining and Developing Millennial Workers

PRACTICAL ADVICE TO EMPLOYERS

Offer career

security

HIRING MANAGERS

ADVISE MILLENNIALS TO:

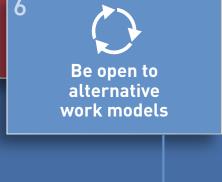

over a perfect fit

Lower initial pay

Develop soft skills

expectations

Prioritize an upward path

Have regular

